The ‘Butcher of Tehran’ Meets a Mountain

One of Iran’s worst monsters goes down.

Thirty-five years after taking part in the massacre of thousands, President Ebrahim Raisi’s helicopter went down over a mountain. Inside the chopper was the body of the man viewed as the likely future Supreme Leader of Iran along with his Foreign Minister and various other officials of the Islamic terrorist regime.

The Iranian people celebrated the death of the man known as the ‘Butcher of Tehran’ with fireworks and dances. Many of those celebrating were the women whom he had tormented for so long.

President Raisi was said to have harbored a special hatred for women and he has been held responsible for everything from prison rapes to the torture of pregnant women. The cleric and former prosecutor had overseen the brutal suppression of human rights protests against the Islamic regime as part of a record of his crimes against humanity going back to the 1980s.

The Islamic Revolution in Iran had brought many monsters to power. Raisi among them. One of the Islamic student radicals who turned a nation with freedom and civil rights into a ruthless Islamic theocracy, Raisi also represented the last generation of the revolution. Still in his early sixties, it was expected that he would usher in the next era of the Islamic Revolution.

But within weeks of Iran’s likely arrival at a nuclear threshold, Raisi went down in a Bell helicopter that the United States had exported to Iran back in the era of the Shah. Iran had spent billions on nukes, ballistic missiles and drones but neglected to invest in developing its own civilian aircraft. While the price of putting guns ahead of butter is usually paid by civilians, it was the 'Butcher of Iran' and his entourage, including Iran's Foreign Minister, who paid the price for their murderous obsession with nuclear weapons with their lives.

The Islamic regime's allies, Iran, Turkey, Russia, and even the European Union scrambled to help. A UN spokesperson said that Secretary General Antonio Guterres "is following reports of an incident with Iranian President Raisi's aircraft with concern. He hopes for the safety of the president and his entourage." But while there may have been mourning at the UN and on college campuses, there were celebrations by Iranians who remembered all too well the atrocities perpetrated by Raisi.

And for widows still mourning their husbands and children mourning their parents, the bloody tide of Islamic atrocities by the Jihadist regime goes back to when Raisi was a young man and the 'Will of Allah' and ropes attached to cranes took their loved ones away from them forever.

In 1988, a humiliated Ayatollah Khomeini having been forced to accept a ceasefire after losing the Iran-Iraq War began a murderous purge of thousands of his political opponents.

The Ayatollah, deathly ill and terrified of a domestic uprising, delegated the killing to the 'Death Committee' whose members included Ebrahim Raisi. Raisi had been appointed a prosecutor despite having a background in little more than Islamic theology. But under Sharia, Islamic law, that was enough for the twenty-eight-year-old cleric to become a member of the quartet responsible for the killings of between 3,000 to 8,000 opponents of the Jihadist regime.

The Ayatollah Khomeini had declared that his political opponents were not true Muslims and were waging war on Allah. In response to his command, the 'Death Committee' signed off on mass hangings on an industrial scale during which thousands were killed in only a few days.

Brutal interrogations were used to determine who was a true Muslim and who was an apostate. Those deemed Muslims survived while those who were judged to be non-Muslims were killed. Prisoners were asked if they believed in Allah, read the infamous 'Koran', and whether they fasted on Ramadan. Those who refused to recite Islamic prayers were beaten and tortured.

In a foreshadowing of Oct 7, part of the Islamic massacres also involved mass rape. A top Islamic cleric later recalled that unmarried girls executed on charges of "waging war against Allah" were first 'married' and then raped by members of the Islamic Revolutionary Guard so that they would not die as virgins and have a chance of going to Islamic paradise.

While the EU, Russia, and Turkey have rallied to search for Raisi, the bodies of the vast majority of those murdered by the 'Butcher of Tehran' in the 1980s were disposed of and hidden. Families have been demanding that they be released so that they can at least be buried.

Instead of releasing their bodies, Raisi and his regime have gone on lying about them.

Many of those families wish that a fraction of the same effort had been invested into finding their loved ones that was being lavished on finding the location of the man who murdered them.

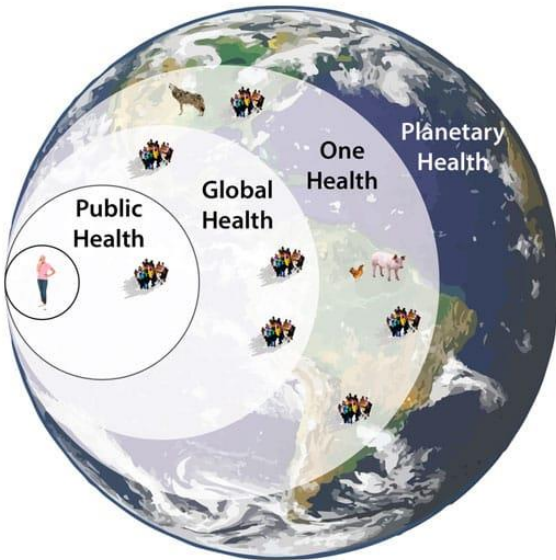

But on a lighter note, the search for Raisi's chopper has unleashed a whirlwind of celebrations, memes, and satirical anecdotes among the Persian people at home and in the diaspora.

The Islamic terror regime strived to project strength and power, but state television footage of regime agents in orange jackets shuffling through maps and getting lost looking for Raisi has instead made the Islamic Revolution appear comical and inept. The men who aspired to rule the region and rain terror on America and Europe stumbled blindly through the wind and darkness trying to find their leader. Their real objective wasn't Raisi, dead or alive, but a desperate effort to buy enough time before announcing that he had been "martyred" by crashing into a mountain in order to maintain power over the country.

"Mohammed made the people believe that he would call a mountain to him," Francis Bacon amusingly described. "The people assembled: Mohammed called the mountain to come to him again and again: and when the hill stood still, he was never a whit abashed, but said, 'If the mountain will not come to Mohammed, Mohammed will go to the mountain.'"

The mountain never did go to the Supreme Leader of Iran and so he ended up going to it and into it.

Patrick Wood explains link between global ‘One Health’ Initiative, Gaia Worship and Technocracy

Some say the coming one-world religion will be Islam. Others say it will be a blended version of the three “Abrahamic” faiths — Islam, Judaism and Christianity. Any of these theories could turn out to be the correct one, but I think Patrick Wood, editor in chief at Technocracy News and Trends, deserves to be heard regarding another possibility. He just released a new article about the fast-spreading earth worship-based One Health Initiative, which is supported and promoted by the United Nations World Health Organization, the Rockefeller Foundation and World Economic Forum all the way down to our state and local healthcare systems. He connects all the dots in the excellent article below, while including helpful graphics and a video. This is something all Christians need to be aware of.

By Patrick Wood at Technocracy.news

The First Amendment starts with, “Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof.” Congress has largely been asleep as forces with the Administration have proliferated “One Health” policies that seek to merge man and the earth into oneness. However, this is an age-old religion associated with paganism, Wicca, and Gaicism, and it needs to be called on the carpet for what it is!

The Center for Disease Control (CDC) defines One Health as:

“One Health is a collaborative, multisectoral, and transdisciplinary approach — working at the local, regional, national, and global levels — with the goal of achieving optimal health outcomes recognizing the interconnection between people, animals, plants, and their shared environment.”

Another 19 Federal agencies are wrapped into the One Health mantra, having been sucked into the “whole-of-government” vortex created under the Clinton administration. Because of the myriad regulations created to enforce it, states, counties, and cities are steeped in it.

The pictorial above depicts a minuscule man relating to public health, global health, one health, and finally, planetary health. Since the planet is sick, mostly by the actions of man, it needs to be healed, resuscitated and made whole again.

Gaia Worship, Wicca and Paganism

One occultic site explains:

“Gaianism is an earth-centered philosophical, spiritual, holistic, scientifically-rational, opinion that shares expressions with various religions such as earth religions and paganism while not identifying exclusively with any specific one.

“Practitioners of Gaianism are called “Gaians”, or sometimes Gaianists. Followers typically approach the philosophy with the perspective that we should honor the earth, reduce or soften the human impact on the earth, and be respectful of all life on earth. The latter perspective is extended to all forms of life such as plant, animal, or human, and followers will often try to maintain a close relationship with the planet.”

Another site dedicated to Wicca states:

“In a world buzzing with technology and fast-paced living, reconnecting with the profound energies of the earth has become more important than ever. One fascinating facet of this connection is the concept of Gaia, a deity embodying the Earth itself in various spiritual traditions.”

Gaia: The Earth Mother

“Gaia, often revered as the Earth Mother, symbolizes the interconnectedness of all living things. Drawing inspiration from ancient Greek mythology, Gaia is the primal goddess who birthed the Titans and gave life to the world. In modern contexts, Gaia is embraced by practitioners of various spiritual paths, including Wicca and Paganism, as a representation of the Earth’s nurturing and life-giving essence.”

The Spirit of Gaia in Wicca

“For Wiccans, Gaia is an elemental force intricately woven into the fabric of their beliefs. The reverence for nature and its cycles aligns seamlessly with the Wiccan wheel of the year, where practitioners celebrate the changing seasons and honor the Earth’s bountiful gifts. Gaia’s presence is palpable in rituals that emphasize grounding, connecting with the land, and fostering a harmonious relationship with the environment.”

In Paganism, “human beings are seen as part of nature, along with other animals, trees, stones, plants and everything else that is of this earth.”

James Lovelock, Technocrat

The “inventor” of Gaiaism was scientist James Lovelock (1918-2022), a climate alarmist who pictured the earth as a living organism. He was also a Technocrat who stated “We need a more authoritarian world. We’ve become a sort of cheeky, egalitarian world where everyone can have their say [...] it may be necessary to put democracy on hold for a while.”

Two scholars at the University of Westminster continued,

“This threat of eco-authoritarianism is often linked to a rising tendency towards technocracy, which suggests that decisions should be left to those with relevant scientific and technical expertise: this, it is implied, will speed up decision-making and generate more effective green outcomes.”

New State-mandated Religion

Since Onc Health has been crammed down our throats by the government, it is safe to say that a new state-mandated religion has been declared. The final proof is this: just try to criticize it (especially if you are a Christian) and see where it gets you.

Germany's woke government wavers as Islamists declare holy war

The German government's laissez-faire approach to Islamism has moved the problem into a taboo zone that has strengthened the Islamists.

By Soeren Kern, Middle East Forum

More than a thousand Islamic extremists recently marched through the streets of Hamburg, Germany's second-largest city, demanding that the European Union's most populous and powerful country be reconstituted as an Islamic state governed by sharia.

The demonstration, organized by a fast-growing Islamist group called Muslim Interaktiv, was allowed to proceed after left-wing parties in Hamburg's legislature rejected a petition by right-wing parties to prohibit the event.

During the April 27 march in Hamburg's multicultural Sankt Georg district, the Islamists — mostly young men, but also women in chadors, hijabs, niqabs, and jilbabs — complained about an alleged surge in "Islamophobia" in Germany since October 7, when Hamas terrorists slaughtered more than 1,000 Israelis.

Amid shouts of "Allahu Akbar" and "There is no God but Allah," the protesters reminded German authorities of their constitutional obligation to ensure justice for everyone.

They then described Germany as a "dictatorship of values" and called for replacing it with a caliphate, an Islamic dictatorship in which there is no separation between state and religion.

The audacious display of Islamist power on German streets cast light on a glaring double standard:

On the one hand, the German government continues to trivialize and even express solidarity with the totalitarian challenge to democracy posed by radical Muslims, who openly seek to overturn Germany's constitutional order; on the other, the government is obsessed with the threats it says are posed to democracy by the anti-immigration Alternative for Germany (AfD), the country's second-largest political party, whose popularity is largely fueled by voters frustrated with the government's refusal to crack down on those very same Islamists.

The German government's laissez-faire approach to Islamism has moved the problem into a taboo zone that has strengthened the Islamists.

Some observers argue that if the German government would only take the Islamist threat more seriously, it could instantly solve the populist problem by removing the main issue that makes the AfD so popular.

But alas, key members of Germany's government — and, apparently, many German voters — are disciples of wokeism, which claims that Islamists are a disadvantaged minority group that must be empowered.

At the same time, Germans seeking to preserve their culture against the encroachment of Islamism are branded as right-wing extremists who pose an existential danger to democracy.

After the Hamburg imbroglio, Interior Minister Nancy Faeser declared: "If you want a caliphate, you've come to the wrong place." And yet, just a few weeks earlier, she'd insisted that the real danger to Germany lies not with the Islamists but with the far right. When asked why she considers right-wing extremism to be more threatening than Islamism, she replied: "Islamism does not want to overthrow the system, right-wing extremists do."

A New Islamism

Muslim Interaktiv, along with its close cousins, Generation Islam and Realität Islam, is the vanguard of a new generation of German Islamists who have replaced old-school jihadist propaganda with the fresh battle cry of grievance peddling.

While the overall goal — to Islamize Western society — remains the same, the new method of adopting the role of an aggrieved minority is more effective because, rather than being overtly illegal, such speech is constitutionally protected.

Muslim Interaktiv, whose stated goal is to establish Islam as a "comprehensive way of life" in Germany, is a successor of Hizb ut-Tahrir, a global pan-Arab and pan-Islamic group that seeks to establish an Islamic caliphate.

Although Hizb ut-Tahrir has been banned in Germany since January 2003, the government continues to turn a blind eye to Muslim Interaktiv, which was established in 2020 and opposes Western liberal democracy, women's rights, and the state of Israel.

Muslim Interaktiv has successfully filled a vacuum created after the destruction of the Islamic State in Syria and Iraq (ISIS) in 2019.

The leader of Muslim Interaktiv is a charismatic 25-year-old Ghanaian-German convert to Islam named Joe Adade Boateng (he now goes by Raheem) who is studying at the University of Hamburg to become a teacher.

He is adept at using social media and digital networking to propagate victim narratives, a strategy that has made him a superstar within the Islamist subculture.

In its latest annual report, Hamburg's state-security agency warned that Muslim Interaktiv was leveraging social media to find new recruits from among Germany's disaffected Muslim youth.

The group's leaders have been described by security experts as "radical pop Islamists" who "shun beards, drive flashy cars, and hate Israel" and produce professional-looking videos that "appeal to young people via the internet."

Hamburg's spy chief, Torsten Voß, said that Muslim Interaktiv is "dangerous" because of its capacity to "increase the number of Islamists in the long term."

An Increasing Base of Support

Muslim Interaktiv and associated groups have mobilized large numbers of followers at public gatherings across Germany.

In March 2024, hundreds of Salafists gathered in Hamburg to listen to a speech by Marcel Krass, an influential convert to Islam who, according to German intelligence, had contact with one of the terrorist hijackers in the 9/11 attacks.

In February 2023, Muslim Interaktiv mobilized 3,500 people in Hamburg to rally against Koran burnings in Sweden.

In October 2023, the group organized a pro-Palestinian protest during which hundreds of demonstrators carrying Islamist flags attacked police officers with bottles and stones.

And in November 2023, more than 3,000 members of Generation Islam — which, like Muslim Interaktiv, is an offshoot of Hizb-ut Tahrir — participated in a virulently anti-Israel protest in Essen, where they called for the establishment of an Islamic caliphate in Germany

Muslim Interaktiv has a large pool of supporters among younger Muslims in Germany.

A new report from the Lower Saxony Criminological Research Institute revealed that a majority of Muslim students (67.8 percent) agreed with the statement: "The rules of the Koran are more important to me than the laws in Germany."

Almost half (45.8 percent) believed that "an Islamic theocracy is the best form of government" and 51.5 percent agreed with the statement: "Only Islam is able to solve the problems of our time."

Turkish-German Islamism expert Eren Güvercin explained the seriousness of Germany's Islamist problem: "The vast majority of caliphate supporters are not refugees, but German citizens. They are children and grandchildren of immigrants, including those who the German state once 'recruited' as cheap labor. They were born in Germany, attended German schools, then German universities. They cannot be deported. It is not just a failure of integration, but also of education.”

Tepid Responses

On May 4, a group of moderate Muslims in Hamburg led by the chairman of the Kurdish community in Germany, Ali Toprak, held a counterdemonstration to Muslim Interaktiv to defend Germany’s liberal democratic constitutional order against the encroachment of radical Islam.

“The Islamists are babbling about the caliphate and sharia,” he said. “We as a civil society shouldn’t put up with that.” In the end, a few hundred people showed up.

One of Germany’s leading experts on political Islam, Ahmad Mansour, lamented that “despite the seriousness” of the challenge posed by Muslim Interaktiv, “only a few are upset, while the majority of the country continues to ignore them.”

He warned the “naïve West” against “tolerating everything — even those forces that would threaten its way of life — in the name of radical diversity and multiculturalism.”

But the mood in the country may now be changing. Germany’s main opposition party, the center-right Christian Democratic Union (CDU), in a stark departure from the years when Angela Merkel ran it, has signaled that it intends to take a much harder line on Islam and migration.

CDU general secretary Carsten Linnemann recently proposed changes to the party platform that would specify that “Sharia does not belong to Germany” and “Everyone who wants to live here must recognize our guiding culture [Leitkultur] without any ifs or buts.”
